When a Transplant Becomes the Only Lifeline

Ahmedabad, Liver disease is emerging as a significant health concern in Ahmedabad, with a growing number of people being diagnosed with cirrhosis- a condition in which healthy liver tissue is gradually replaced by scar tissue. As the damage progresses, the liver loses its ability to carry out vital functions such as removing toxins, producing proteins, and aiding digestion. In severe cases, this can lead to liver failure, leaving transplantation as the only viable treatment option. "Liver transplantation is not required for every patient with cirrhosis, but delaying treatment can reduce the chances of a successful outcome. The focus should always be on early diagnosis and timely intervention, as many cases can be managed effectively before they reach the stage of liver failure," says Dr. Pathik Parikh, Consultant Hematology and liver Transplant Physician, Apollo Hospitals International Ltd., Ahmedabad. The worrying part is that cirrhosis develops slowly and often remains unnoticed for years. Many patients do not experience obvious symptoms until the disease has reached an advanced stage. (19-10)

India: The history they studied in boxes

I spent 40 years in the international shipping industry, in London, Tokyo, Singapore and Dubai. When I decided to write a book on the history of maritime trade, I had no academic position to defend and no orthodoxy to uphold. But I had a working knowledge of how trade actually functions and a professional habit of asking challenging questions and following evidence wherever it led.

When I followed the sea lanes backwards into deep antiquity, I found that they converged on the Indian subcontinent. That was not the book I had intended to write. It was the book the evidence forced me to write. And the more I looked, the more I came to understand that the conventional account of the ancient world had been built on a set of assumptions that nobody had thought to question for a long time.

Where archaeologists chose to dig

In the second half of the 19th century, European archaeologists made remarkable discoveries in the deserts of Mesopotamia: cuneiform tablets, the Code of Hammurabi, the great ziggurats. These were genuine and important finds. They were also conveniently located. The hot, dry climate of Mesopotamia preserves clay and brick beautifully. The Biblical and classical sources European scholars had read pointed them to the region.

So, they dug there. What they found became the foundation of the standard account: Mesopotamia as the cradle of civilisation, the birthplace of writing, of urbanism, of law, of mathematics. The story moved from Mesopotamia to Egypt to Greece to Rome to Christendom to modern Europe in a tidy westward, arc. India appeared only as a colonial possession at the end of it. What they did not do was dig with comparable intensity in north-west India. Harappa was identified in 1842 but not seriously explored until the 1920s. Mohenjo-daro was discovered only in 1922. By the time these excavations began, the dominant assumption was already set. Mesopotamia was the centre. Anything found in India had to be derivative. What was actually there But the Indus-Saraswati civilisation was not derivative. It was the largest and most economically productive society of the ancient world. By the middle of the third millennium BC, it supported about 300 riverine cities, each with populations of over 50,000 people. Two-thirds of them stood on the banks of the Saraswati, the central of the seven rivers described in the Rig Veda. Canals supplied water to 2,500 dependent.
