Star Air Launches Direct Flights to Mundra, Unlocking New Growth from June 23

Ahmedabad, Star Air, India's fastest-growing regional airline and the aviation arm of the Sanjay Ghodawat Group, has announced the launch of scheduled commercial services to Mundra (MDA), Gujarat, marking the airline's 32nd destination on its expanding domestic network. Operations are set to commence from 23 June 2026, further strengthening Star Air's commitment to connecting underserved regions of India with major economic and cultural centres.

Commenting on the launch, Capt. Simran Singh Tiwana, CEO of Star Air, said, "Every new destination added to our network reflects our belief that enhanced connectivity can unlock opportunities and drive inclusive growth. The commencement of our services to Mundra, home to India's largest private commercial and container port, reinforces Star Air's commitment to strengthening regional connectivity through reliable, convenient, and affordable air travel. We thank the Ministry of Civil Aviation and the Government of India for their continued support through the UDAN initiative as we continue connecting more communities across India." (19-10)

Xiaomi Launches the REDMI Turbo 5, Built for India's New Generation of Power Users

Ahmedabad, Xiaomi India today announced the launch of the REDMI Turbo 5, marking the debut of the REDMI Turbo series in India. Built for users who expect more from their smartphones, the REDMI Turbo 5 brings together powerful performance, exceptional battery endurance, advanced imaging capabilities, immersive entertainment and dependable durability in a premium package.

The Iran war is approaching its inflection point

History teaches us that wars do not end when one side is completely destroyed. They end when all sides arrive, often reluctantly, at the conclusion that continuing the conflict is no longer worth the cost. There comes a moment in every war when the returns begin to diminish, the risks become increasingly unpredictable, and the possibility of achieving any meaningful strategic gain is outweighed by the prospect of long-term damage. Such moments are not always accompanied by public admissions of fatigue. On the contrary, they are frequently masked by defiant rhetoric, declarations of resolve, and assertions of imminent victory. Yet beneath the surface, calculations change.

The current conflict involving Iran, Israel, and the United States appears to have reached precisely such an inflection point. Every protagonist in this war can now credibly claim, to its domestic audience and to the world, that it has achieved its principal objectives. Once that becomes possible, the political space for de-escalation emerges. The challenge then is not military, but psychological: how to stop fighting without appearing to surrender. The United States can already present the conflict as a demonstration of its overwhelming military superiority. Washington can argue that it has taught Iran a costly lesson, degraded important elements of its military capability, weakened the aura of invulnerability that Tehran sought to project, and significantly constrained its nuclear ambitions. For an American administration seeking to justify its actions, the narrative of success is readily available.

Israel, too, can claim victory. For years, it has regarded Iran as the principal strategic threat to its security. Through direct military engagement and coordinated action with the United States, it can assert that it has conveyed unmistakably to Tehran both its resolve and its capacity to respond forcefully to any perceived threat. The message that Israel wished to send—to Iran, to its regional adversaries, and to its own citizens—has already been delivered. Continuing the conflict indefinitely is unlikely to enhance that message.

Iran, paradoxically, can also emerge from the conflict with a narrative of triumph. Nations do not measure victory solely in territorial gains or military statistics. They also measure it in terms of dignity, resilience, and national pride. Tehran can tell its people that it stood firm against two of the most formidable military powers in the world and refused to bend. It can claim that despite immense pressure, economic sanctions, military attacks, and diplomatic isolation, it preserved its sovereignty and demonstrated the power of national resolve.

This is why the present moment is particularly significant. All sides can claim success. When that condition exists, diplomacy becomes possible. There are also other compelling reasons for ending the war. The Gulf states understand the dangers of prolonged instability. Their prosperity rests on predictability, investment, trade, and the uninterrupted functioning of energy markets. While they may differ in their relations with Iran, they share a common interest in avoiding a regional conflagration. Extended conflict threatens not only shipping lanes and energy infrastructure but also the confidence on which their economic models depend. The Strait of Hormuz remains the most obvious symbol of these concerns. A substantial portion of the world's energy supplies passes through this narrow waterway. Any prolonged disruption inevitably raises oil prices, fuels inflation, unsettles financial markets, and damages economies far removed from the Middle East. The world has already experienced enough geopolitical shocks in recent years. It has little appetite for another. The internal compulsions facing the principal actors further strengthen the case for peace. In the United States, foreign military engagements have rarely remained insulated from domestic politics. President Trump faces growing public dissatisfaction over economic concerns. Rising prices, particularly those linked to energy costs, are never popular with voters. The approach of congressional midterm elections inevitably sharpens political calculations. No administration wishes to be associated with an open-ended conflict whose costs continue to mount while its benefits become increasingly difficult to explain.
