

Rising Hepatitis A Cases Amid Monsoon Season

Ahmedabad, As the monsoon season sets in, India is faced with a pressing health crisis-the heightened risk of water-borne diseases, including hepatitis. Recent outbreaks in regions like Kerala have sounded the alarm for immediate preventive measures, especially in states like Gujarat, where reported cases have seen a worrying surge. Hepatitis, particularly hepatitis A, is a threat that primarily targets the liver and is transmitted through the ingestion of contaminated food and water. The risk is heightened in compromised hygiene and sanitation environments, making monsoon seasons particularly conducive to spreading water-borne viruses. Children, Individuals residing in unhygienic areas, hostellers, and frequent diners are especially at risk and should exercise extra caution. Dr. Mahharshi Harkhani (Patel), a prominent pediatrician and vaccine expert, emphasizes, "Vaccination remains our strongest defense against hepatitis A. It not only safeguards individuals but also contributes to community-wide immunity, thereby reducing the overall burden of the disease."
