Indian Families Seek Phone Free Dinner Tables

Ahmedabad, vivo India today released the seventh edition of its annual Switch Off Report understanding "The Impact of Excessive Smartphone Usage on Parent-Child Relationships". This year's edition reinforces the central purpose behind vivo's Switch Off initiative – encouraging people to foster better relationships with their smartphones and prioritize real life relationships. The report is the part of the larger Switch Off initiative which emphasizes spending more time with your loved ones. As digital connectivity becomes deeply woven into everyday life, the study explores how families are adapting to changing digital behaviour and uncovers two defining insights: families feeling dinner time as their most reliable moment of daily connection and children turning to AI as they feel their parents are too busy. The study highlights that 72% of children spend most time with their parents during dinner. With 91% of children saying conversations feel easier and more meaningful when phones are kept aside, dinner becomes a natural space where attention aligns and families reconnect. Encouragingly, the study highlights a growing willingness among families to rebuild these shared moments. Parents and children are experimenting with simple behavioural shifts reducing notifications, keeping phones away from shared spaces, or choosing offline activities which help them feel more in control and more present.
